Shanna Niehaus' five-year-old son Kai had autism. Children with autism(自閉症) struggle with relationships. Shanna worried that Kai would not make friends or ever hug her. She took him to many doctors, but none could help. Then, she learned about service dogs trained to help people with autism. One day, a service dog called Tornado arrived. Everything changed. Kai immediately wanted to be close to it. When Tornado lay down, Kai did the same with his head on the dog's furry body. From that day Kai has become happier. In fact, he even allows his mother to hug him now.

Many children with autism cannot be aware of danger. Jennifer Mandell kept her boy Sam at home from the age of two. Sam did not know that he needed his mother to keep him safe and ran away from her. He even ran into moving cars. Like Shanna, Jennifer decided to get a service dog. She registered a dog named Hagar, specially trained for autism. Sam felt comfortable with the dog, so Jennifer took them out. Sam held on to the dog and did not run away. Thanks to Hagar, Jennifer can now safely take Sam out. These two service dogs are the boys' best buddies. They have certainly made a great difference to their family life.

Service dogs are trained to help people. In fact, this working relationship began thousands of years ago. At first, the world was full of danger for humans. They struggled all the time just to stay alive. Large, strong dogs could help keep them safe. They would bark when strangers entered their surroundings and attack those strangers if they came too close. Fast dogs helped these people look for and hunt animals for food. Farmers also trained smart herding dogs to help them look after sheep.

Service dogs have also helped people with special needs. A dog leading a blind man was painted on a wall in the Roman Empire two thousand years ago. In 1750, a Paris hospital began to train dogs to help the blind. Guide dogs help blind people worldwide cross roads and keep them safe from accidents.

Nowadays, service dogs do things such as helping with police work. The first police dog training school opened in Germany in 1920. Police dogs help police officers chase and catch people. A characteristic of dogs is their excellent sense of smell, so some are trained as detection dogs. They help the police search for things like illegal drugs.

Service dogs have served people since the earliest times. Thanks to their hard work, the world is a better place for all of us.
