Education is one of things which every person should have the right to. Unfortunately, not every kid is able to stay in school. Students might, for instance, live in very remote areas or very poor where resources are limited. In some cases, natural disasters, like earthquakes and flooding might also prevent them from attending class. At last, serious pandemics like COVID-19 can interfere with children’s education as well, and even make going to school dangerous. For most of these situations, there is only one practical solution which stands out: online learning. In China alone, for instance, around 250 million students attended daily e-learning sessions in 2020. These virtual classrooms made sure that learners, in spite of not being able to go to school, did not stop their studies. Research has even suggested online students are more productive.
