Quality teamwork is one of the most important factors in an organization’s success. It’s no surprise, therefore, that technology giant Google places a high value on __ (1) __. In fact, the company spent years studying hundreds of teams to find out __ (2) __ factors made up successful teams. At first, they hoped to find some system that could measure people’s personality types, and then put the similar types together to make a perfect team. __ (3) __ trying many different ways of doing this, they did not find any perfect mix of personalities.

However, Google did uncover the most important quality that separates teams that function well from __ (4) __ that function poorly. This is called “psychological safety,” which is the team members’ shared belief that their team is safe for risk-taking. It means that all team members feel they can speak up without the person __ (5) __ stopping them or others making fun of them. Psychological safety is developed when people work together toward common goals, which is why team-building activities can have such strong benefits. Increasing trust, communication, and friendliness among the team members will also increase the team’s quality.

A short hug can be a big step toward easing tension, and this was the idea behind the actions of two individuals living in different parts of the world. Back in 2014, in the midst of high tensions between Japan and China, Watanabe Kohei was studying international relations at Peking University in Beijing, China. In an effort to promote friendship between Japan and China, Kohei and five other Japanese students took a walk in a park in Beijing and tried to give hugs to passersby. They held a big sign that said, “Hugs to promote friendship between China and Japan.” Although many locals were a bit shy about being hugged, the students managed to hug about 200 locals during their one-hour walk.

In 2013, tragedy struck at the annual Boston Marathon in the United States when two bomb explosions near the race’s finish line killed three people and injured close to 300 others. After witnessing the bombing, Ken Nwadike decided to join the race the following year. He failed to qualify* for the race, but he still participated in the event in a different way: Holding a “Free Hugs” sign, he gave out free hugs to the runners. This simple act produced many smiles and lifted the runners’ spirits. The passion of individuals like Kohei and Nwadike can help change the world for the better.
