Title: _____

Deadouts Deadouts are when all the bees in a colony die. Bees' immune* systems weaken in the winter and they are more likely to suffer from diseases and parasites*.	Colony Collapse Disorder Colony Collapse Disorder, or CCD, is when the majority of bees in a colony fly away from the hive* leaving just the queen and a few worker bees, which are not able to survive on their own. CCD is still being studied to see what reasons are behind it.

Bees are a common insect, but how well do you really know them? Here are some interesting facts about our fuzzy flying friends. First, bees are some of the hardest-working insects on the planet. Because of their ability to create honey, they are the most popular insect creators of food for people. To make honey, they fetch nectar from flowers and bring it back to the hive. There, they fan it using their wings. Incredibly, they are not born knowing how to make honey but are taught by older bees. In order to make a single kilogram of honey, the bees need to visit flowers an incredible fifty thousand times. That should make you appreciate your spoonful of honey much more! Last but not least, bees' wings can beat at incredible speeds—up to 11,400 times per minute! This is why we hear a buzzing sound whenever they fly past us. It sure is interesting learning about bees, isn't it?

assist human volunteers in hotels and at tourist attractions during the Tokyo Olympic Games. Social robots are also tested out in Japan to care for the elderly in nursing homes. There, gentle robot caregivers help to serve food and entertain lonely residents. Still, another type of social robots does all the housework. As their prices fall, these hardworking housekeepers may become a common home appliance. Researchers even tried out robot teachers at elementary schools to engage students in learning, or to patiently help children with communication difficulties learn social skills.

However, not everyone welcomes social robots with open arms. Some people are afraid that human partners may be disappointed when robots do not behave exactly like humans. Others are not sure if children learning from robots will be able to handle surprises in real-world communication. These and many other questions are being asked, but researchers will not stop efforts to develop effective social robots.
