Attending a forest school in Denmark means having more time to play in nature. This type of school began in the 1950s when one mother 21 a plan to do some school activities in the forest. The program grew and today, children from 3 to 6 years old around the country have the 22 to attend forest kindergartens. There may be three teachers teaching thirty students 23 in a class. 24 school hours, kids can be seen climbing trees, learning the names of flowers and animals, and playing in teams. Not only do these activities allow children to feel more 25 nature, but also they help them learn and grow. Without walls and other 26, the environment allows children to discover new things and develop their imaginations. It also gives them a chance to take 27 and learn their limits. Moreover, they learn practical 28 like flexible approaches to solve problems. This promotes maturity, which can then lead to less 29 to change. Many researchers have applauded the 30 program. Forest schools can now be found all over the world.

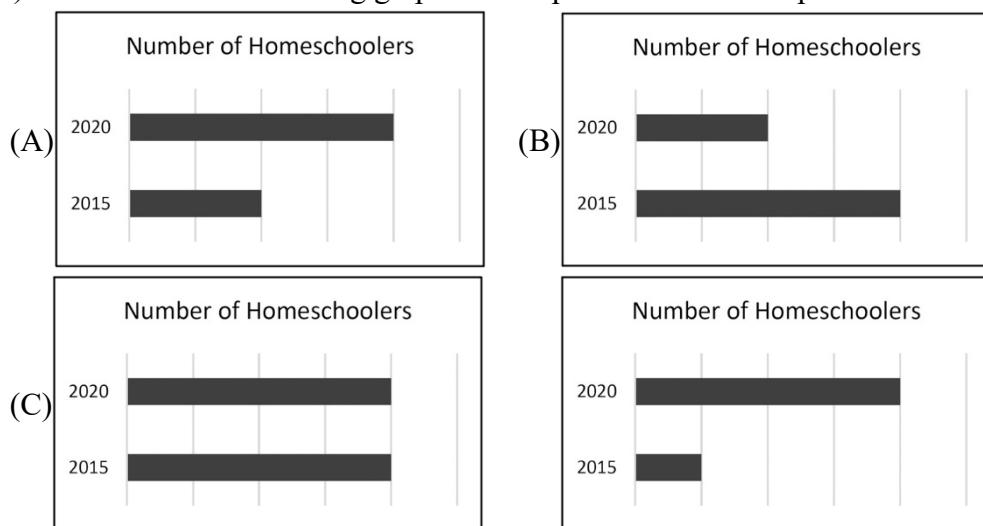

四、混合題(素養題)(1 小題，每格 2 分，第 33 題 5 分 共 9 分) 第 33 提請作答於第三頁

Homeschooling* has been growing quickly over the last decade. For example, it is estimated that from 2015 to 2020, the number of American families that started homeschooling doubled. Yet homeschooling is still subject to myths and misunderstandings. First of all, most people think that homeschoolers don't socialize* as much as those who attend traditional schools. The truth, however, is that homeschoolers can socialize more. For them, learning takes place in more places than inside a classroom. By routinely visiting museums, parks, science centers, and other places, they have more opportunities to socialize with adults and other people.

In addition, people might have the impression that homeschoolers do not go to college. In fact, homeschoolers are more likely to attend college than traditionally schooled students. Furthermore, when homeschoolers are enrolled*, they are also more likely to stay in and graduate. Other data suggests that homeschooled students generally perform better on tests. Another incorrect claim is that homeschoolers lack the opportunity to play sports or participate in extracurricular activities. What most people don't know is that many public schools allow homeschoolers to play on school sports teams or participate in other after-school activities. One key benefit of homeschooling is flexibility for families, so there is no shortage of time for kids to be active outside their daily learning. Since homeschooling is personalized* by its nature, you can mold* it to best fit your family's needs.
