三、閱讀測驗 (5 題，每題 2 分，共 10 分)

Can you tell if the news you are reading is true or fake? With easy access to the Internet, people receive vast amounts of information every day, and rumors spread like wildfire before they are confirmed. To tackle the problem of fake news, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) is launching an educational program that aims to teach secondary students in the United Kingdom how to tell the differences between real and fake news.

BBC collaborated with the University of Salford on a year-long project to see how well British children between the ages of 9 and 14 could identify fake news. Their research showed that many of these students had trouble distinguishing between real and fake when it came to news stories, even though most of them had heard about fake news before. The program, which will launch in March this year, will include mentoring from BBC journalists, and students both in schools and online in UK will be taught how to filter the news they receive. They want to ensure that teenagers can be equipped with the knowledge to avoid being deceived by misinformation and fabricated news. Up to 1,000 schools will derive benefit from this scheme.

"There's more information than ever before," said James Harding, director of BBC News, "some of it is old news. Some of it is half truths. Some of it is just downright lies. And it's harder than ever when you look at those information feeds to discern what's true and what's not." This new initiative intends to enable people to make better choices not only about the news they consume, but also in their lives.

Just three years ago, the problems that Cape Town, South Africa, is now facing would have been unthinkable. Back in 2014, the city had a stable water supply, and its dams were full of water. In fact, Cape Town won an environmental award for its water management the following year. Unfortunately, the situation has been reversed completely this year, and Cape Town is facing the worst water crisis in centuries.

From February 1, the water consumption limit for residents in Cape Town is 50 liters a day. The government has cautioned that "Day Zero" will be coming to Cape Town in April. On this day, the water supply to homes and businesses will be shut off. Water will still be available to the city's hospitals and schools, but many of Cape Town's four million residents will be affected by this action. People will have to queue up for water every day, and some have predicted that this will spark off unrest and even riots or violence.

What has led to this severe crisis? The water reservoir is almost depleted after a three-year drought, and the dam that supplies half of Cape Town's water is only at 13% capacity. Some say that this highlights the dangers of global climate change. Experts expressed that droughts like this may soon become common in many other parts of the world.

Local officials have urged residents to conserve water. Deputy mayor, Ian Neilson, emphasized that "Day Zero" can still be averted, and if people cut down on water consumption, the tap will be more likely to stay open to the rainy season in May.

() 49. According to the passage, what caused the water crisis in Cape Town to arise?

- (A) Rapid population growth in Cape Town since 2014.
- (B) An unstable water supply system that was built recently.
- (C) Global climate change that caused more severe droughts.
- (D) Industrial development and water pollution.

() 50. According to the passage, which of the following is true?

- (A) On Day Zero, water supply across South Africa will be shut off.
- (B) The water consumption limit for residents in Cape Town is 70 liters a day.
- (C) The water capacity of the dam in Cape Town is at 30%.
- (D) Day Zero can still be avoided if water consumption is reduced.
