When humans first landed on the moon in 1969, the event was considered an impressive ____1____ that changed how people imagined the future. After that success, many believed the next major goal would be Mars. However, progress did not move as quickly as it ____2____ during the Apollo era, and for decades the dream of reaching Mars remained out of reach. This changed in 2016 ____3____ the U.S. president asked NASA to send humans to Mars by 2033. Soon after, NASA released a detailed plan, and many scientists said they would be truly grateful to the team for renewing public interest in deep-space exploration.

NASA's mission is divided into five stages. Stage 0 focuses on experiments on the International Space Station and cooperation with private companies. Stage I involves building the Deep Space Gateway (DSG), a lunar station ____4____ improved communication systems and modern life-support technology. Around 2027, NASA will send the Deep Space Transport (DST) to the DSG. Four astronauts will live in it temporarily to test all systems, and they must ____5____ to living in a small space for long periods. Afterward, the DST will be resupplied and prepared for ____6____ is so-called the first long-distance human mission to Mars. If everything goes as planned, NASA may ____7____ in sending people to the Red Planet by 2033.

Despite this progress, several major difficulties remain. NASA now receives only 0.5% of U.S. spending—far lower than before—and the long mission requires a huge amount of food, water, oxygen, and fuel. Astronauts also face ____8____ risks because they must stay separated from everyone else on Earth for almost three years in limited space.

The difficulties mentioned above are unavoidable and cannot be solved for the time being. ____9____, companies such as SpaceX and Boeing are working on similar goals, including developing powerful rockets and reusable spacecraft that increase the chances of humans successfully traveling to Mars. Each organization hopes to make a great ____10____ to future exploration, and whichever team reaches Mars first may be officially recognized as a leader of human travel beyond Earth.

Doctors want to offer their patients the best quality care, but they often have busy schedules and many patients waiting to be seen. They are under time pressure and often have a lot of information to process at once. This situation can make careful ____11____ difficult. As a result, doctors tend to rely on quick decisions that affect patient care. Research has shown that unconscious biases exist among doctors. There is general ____12____ that these biases can influence medical judgment and treatment outcomes.

Biases can shape how doctors gather information and choose treatments. One common type occurs when doctors focus only on ____13____ that confirms their beliefs while ignoring anything that does not. A second example appears when doctors assume that ____14____ racial groups are more likely to suffer from particular diseases. A third occurs when a doctor continues to trust his or her own interpretation even when it is incorrect. This tendency is sometimes ____15____ to as a diagnostic shortcut. Bias may also arise when doctors depend too heavily on their own past experiences, even if the situation does not fully match what they have seen before.

A doctor's ____16____ reactions can also affect medical decisions. Some patients may show strong signs of fear, pain, or exhaustion, and these reactions can influence how a doctor feels toward them. These emotions can reduce a doctor's ability to remain objective. In some situations, doctors ____17____ more quickly to patients who seem especially distressed. A patient may ____18____ immediate medical attention because the doctor feels a stronger sense of urgency. Bias can also appear when a doctor already knows the final outcome of a case and allows that result to shape the decision. A doctor may nevertheless choose aggressive treatments for a close friend even when success is unlikely.

Reducing medical bias begins with recognizing that everyone has biases. Doctors can slow down and take more time before choosing a treatment. They can also ask other medical professionals for different opinions. Hospitals provide programs to improve decision-making and make an ____19____ to offer training that improves professional judgment. These programs can also help doctors gain confidence and offer encouragement to support careful thinking. Doctors who continue ____20____ these skills are more likely to treat patients more fairly. Hopefully, they can accomplish more equal and effective care for all patients.

In April or May near the Bunun tribes of Taiwan, you may hear the singing of Pasibutbut songs. The Bunun people sing these songs to pray for a good harvest. Pasibutbut is more than just music—it carries deep meaning. ____21____ These songs are part of the most important Bunun festival, Ma-naq-tainga.

Ma-naq-tainga means the Ear-Shooting Festival. ____22____ Through this tradition, the Bunun honor bravery and skill, seeing the hunt as a step toward maturity.

On the festival morning, adult males go to the mountains to hunt pigs, bears, and deer. Before leaving the village, they offer a short prayer for protection and success. ____23____ Finally, they share what happened during the hunt as elders listen and give praise.

____24____ The difference in color shows their roles: men as hunters and protectors, women as symbols of life and beauty.

Although many Bunun festivals do not allow outsiders, the Ear-Shooting Festival welcomes visitors. Today, people shoot at cardboard targets instead of live animals. The Bunun hope that by opening their celebration, more people will understand their traditions and close relationship with nature.

- (A) During the festival, men wear dark blue or black clothes so animals are less likely to notice them, while women wear bright blue dresses with colorful headbands.
- (B) Since it is difficult to shoot the ears of an animal when hunting, this festival allows young men and boys to prove they have become adult males by successfully hunting down at least an ear from an animal.
- (C) The Bunun people pass down the knowledge of hunting and singing from elders to children through oral traditions, ensuring their cultural practices continue across generations.

四、閱讀測驗 (每題2.5分，共10分)

When 20 Africans were brought to America as slaves by the Dutch in 1619, it marked the beginning of 400 years of terrible treatment of African Americans. These Africans were forced to work on plantations without pay or freedom, beginning a system that treated human beings very badly. By 1860, there were more than 4 million African-American slaves in America, most of them living in the southern states where cotton and tobacco farms depended on slave labor.

In 1861, the American Civil War began. President Abraham Lincoln wanted to ban slavery, but seven southern states wanted it to continue because their economy depended on it, while the northern states supported freedom and equality. In 1865, the northern states won the war, and new laws for the United States banned slavery. However, many southern states created Jim Crow laws that treated African Americans very badly. These laws separated schools, buses, and restaurants by race, forcing African Americans to live under constant unfair treatment and fear.

The Civil Rights movement, which began in 1880, fought to achieve equal rights for African Americans. In 1954, the Supreme Court ruled that separating students by race was illegal. That same year, Rosa Parks was taken away by the police after refusing to give her seat to a white passenger., which inspired many to protest peacefully by avoiding buses. These nonviolent actions encouraged others to believe change was possible.

In 1963, Martin Luther King led the March on Washington, where over 200,000 people heard his famous "I have a dream" speech. In 1964 and 1965, the Civil Rights Act and Voting Rights Act became law, guaranteeing equal treatment for all races and marking a major step toward the American ideal of freedom and justice for all.

The first stage of developing a vaccine is to produce a vaccine that stops the disease. Vaccines are tested on living cells and then on living animals. If a vaccine is effective and does not cause harm, then it can be tested on humans. These are called clinical trials. If the clinical trials are successful, then the vaccine is checked by the government before it is sold.

People of different races can react differently to vaccines. It is very important that people of different races are included in clinical trials. However, this does not always happen in vaccine trials. This means some people can experience a less effective vaccine, or more side effects, because they are from a group that was not tested in the clinical trials.

To extend the range of people in clinical trials, the FDA (Federal Drug Administration) in America has started an education plan for COIVD-19 to encourage people of different races to participate in clinical trials. The COVID-19 vaccine clinical trials increased the number of participants and the time of the trials so that people of different races could participate. Although the COVID-19 vaccine clinical trials still included a large percentage of white participants, the percentage of racial minorities is better than most previous large vaccine trials.

Clinical trials for COVID-19 vaccine (Moderna & Pfizer-BioNTech) 2020

Race of people in the clinical trial	Moderna	Pfizer-BioNTech
White	79.4%	81.9%
Black	9.7%	9.8%
Asian	4.7%	4.4%
